Community Life

This National Conference will explore the significance of and problems growing from the use of advocacy planning as a means of engendering both citizen participation and pluralism in planning. The issue is how genuinely adequate representation of all the community interests will be obtained. Some of the major specific questions are:

What does advocacy mean?

How has it been working and what changes are needed?

Is the Model Cities experience relevant and real?

What are the psycho-social implications of such participative processes?

The forum participants will be a mix of government officials, university scholars, practitioner-planners and active citizen participants from across the nation, from which should come a development of guidelines for effectively incorporating advocacy into citizen participation processes; and a determination of the implications of programs and practices relating to pluralism and advocacy in planning for the character and quality of community life and individual well-being in a complex urban society.
